Chapter 20

“The first thing I noticed when I stepped out of the car was the cold. It wasn’t just the temperature, but the way it seeped into your bones, a stark contrast to the warmth of the car’s interior. I shivered, my hands instinctively reaching for the pockets of my coat. The air smelled crisp, almost clean, but with a hint of something unfamiliar, something that made me pause and take a deep breath. It was a mix of earth and something else, something that hinted at the secrets this place might hold. I looked up at the sky, a pale blue with wispy clouds, and felt a sense of vastness, of being small in a world that felt so much larger than I was. The silence around me was not empty, but full, a quiet hum of life that I couldn’t quite place. It was in that moment, as I stood there, feeling the cold and the silence, that I knew I had entered a new world, one that was both beautiful and terrifying. The road ahead was long, and the journey was just beginning.”
